Understanding the Report

All measurements produced will be relative to one number:
General Intensity (GI).

GI should be treated as the baseline for indicating a potential.

Imagine having to walk around all day while holding a glass containing a liquid.

The potential would be liquid spilling over, and the GI is the absolute brim of the glass.

In other words:

- Higher potential would be indicated as a measurement at or above GI.
- Lower potential would be indicated as a measurement below GI, near or at zero.
- Measurements below GI yet some distance away from zero, generally speaking, can be disregarded until it equal or exceed GI. Interpretation of the potential is dependent on what the measurement means to the observer.

A suggestion for interpreting non-zero measurements below GI, ask:

“Could anyone walk around comfortably holding the glass without any liquid spilling over?”

Always compare measurement against GI.
